SCORES IN CONCERT

Mischa Elman Triumphs in Cut Glass Excellent Programme.

YMPHONY ORCHESTRA A HIT

of Season's Series of Concer Boston Organisation, with Noted Violinist as Soloist, Is Heard by an Audience that Taxes the Capacity of the Theater.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler conducting, scored a triumph yesterday afternoon at its third concert of the season at the New National Theater. Mischa Elman, violinist was the away from the doors, as the last bit of standing room was sold before the first number of the orchestra began. • The opening number was Handel's Overture in D major, a concert overture, the form of music in vogue in the eight-centh century, but not necessarily belonging to an opera. The second number was Beethoven's seventh symphony. This was given with a seriousness, artistic finish, and a depth of soulfulness which entirely satisfied the most exacting musician. The perfect balance of the orchestra and the deep appreciation of the master's thoughts and temperament were voiced throughout this work. The last two moments showed temperament and refinement, and the Boston Symphony never showed itself to better advantage than in this work. Overture in f) major, a concert overture. phony never showed itself to better advantage than in this work.

Interest centered on the Beethoven Symphony, the violin solos, by Lalo, and the Humperdinek mosle, "In a Moorish Cafe," from a "Moorish Rhapsody."

Scores Personal Triumph.

Elman's work in the Lalo Spanish symphony, for violin and orchestra, only is wonderful, and he throws off double sixths and harmonics as though they were but waste efforts. There is as much color in his tone as though he were painting in oils instead of on violin strings, and he depicts the human senti-istrings, and he depicts the human sentuments.

No less praise may be given the orchestra in its wonderful accompaniments, which never dominated and never lagged.
The Spanish Symphony is a most interesting work throughout, and there was a very perceptible smile of satisfaction
among those familiar with the wellknown "La Paloma" when suspiciously similar strains in the second part were exquisitely given.

It is not often that any soloist receives such an ovation as did Mischa Elman
after the completion of this work, but there was no breaking of a Boston Symphony rule of no encores, and he returned several times to bow his acknowledgments.

Mr. Fiedler made more friends and knowledgments.

Mr. Fiedler made more friends and admirers yesterday than he had before. No one, not even the most unreasonable of musicians, could accuse him of lack of temperament. This is a thing which is not acquired but it does grow to greater proportions. If he seemed not to have it last year, it does not mean that it was missing from his make-up. He is in closer touch with his players, no doubt, this season than he war last, and has greater authority over them; in fact, he dominates them:
